Crosstown Industrial Park — Land which was cleared for a major highway is instead being developed to provide a greater number of industrial jobs for the community

Madison Park — The Madison Park High School, the Occupational Resource Center and the new Roxbury Community College to be located nearby will create a major educational complex here serving the entire community

Dudley Station — The MBTA's Orange Line provides rapid transit service to downtown Boston, and buses connect Dudley Station with the rest of the city. A new civic center with library, courthouse, police station and fire station reinforces the Dudley area's role as a center of government and business in Roxbury. Newly constructed housing nearby in Lower Roxbury is further increasing the vitality of the area.

Highland Park — The First Church in Roxbury at John Eliot Square, built in 1804, is a reminder that this is one of Boston's oldest neighborhoods. Energetic residents and community groups are working hard to restore the homes here which include Greek Revival country houses from the early 1800's, brick rowhouses from the late 1800's and early 20th century homes. The towering water standpipe erected in 1869 on the site of the Revolutionary War era Roxbury High Fort is a landmark visible from many distant points. Many homes here have attractive views of the downtown skyline and neighboring hills.

Say-Mer — Sometimes called the "Say-Mer" neighborhood after Sawin and Moreland Streets, the residential area between Warren Street and Blue Hill Avenue has more owner-occupied single- and two-family homes than most other Roxbury neighborhoods. It is a stable, family-oriented neighborhood of Victorian-era homes with ample yards on tree-lined streets.

Shirley-Eustis House — "Built in 1747, this house was the home of two governors of the Massachusetts Bay Colony. In Colonial times, Dudley Street connected the outlying settlements in Dorchester with Boston. The Shirley-Eustis House was set way back from Dudley Street and overlooked the waterfront which was later filled in for industrial use.

Washington Park — Victorian mansions, brick apartments with a view across Franklin Park, triple-deckers, townhouses overlooking Horatio Harris Park, new housing and 100-year-old homes with a view of the downtown skyline all add to the variety and interest of the Washington Park neighborhood. Major street and sidewalk improvements and new lighting have given streets an attractive, well-maintained appearance. Many excellent community facilities are located here including a YMCA, a Boys Club, the Roxbury Comprehensive Community Health Center, the National Center of Afro-American Artists, the William Monroe Trotter School and, in the Washington Park playground, an ice skating rink, outdoor swimming pool, lighted ball fields, tennis and basketball courts and a recreation building.

Franklin Park — Boston's largest park has 500 acres of gently rolling hills with horseback-riding trails through the woods, a golf course, a zoo, an athletic stadium and a pond. Each spring thousands of people gather here to enjoy the annual Great Boston Kite Festival.
